Selling during a separation

Separation or divorce – selling the property with clarity and calm

Selling the house during a separation or divorce adds an emotional and legal layer to an already demanding transaction. With a clear framework and the right professionals, we can get there in a fair and peaceful way.

This guide outlines the key points: the legal status of the property according to your situation, the decisions to be made together, the sharing of the proceeds of the sale, and the role of a neutral broker.

Informative content, not legal advice: rely on a notary or lawyer. Each chapter ends with a lined “My Notes” page.

Selling during a separation adds an emotional charge to an already demanding process. This guide helps you stay on track: understanding the status of the property, choosing between selling, repurchasing or waiting, setting the price together, sharing the product and remaining functional despite the conflict.

The common thread: structure and delegate so that emotion does not cost money.

CHAPTER

Understanding Property Status

Know who owns what depending on your situation.

The rights to the property depend on your situation: married (with the rules of family patrimony), civilly united, or de facto spouses (whose rights differ depending on whether or not they are co-owners of the title). This is a crucial and often misunderstood point.

- Married / civilly united: family residence is governed by specific rules.
- Common-law partners: rights depend largely on who is registered on the title.
- A legal opinion clarifies your exact situation.

Your rights to property depend on your status: married/civilly united (family assets), or de facto spouses (writing and title take precedence). Clarifying who owns what is the first step - it conditions sharing and future decisions.

EMILIE'S ADVICE

Never assume your rights to the house without legal advice, especially in a common-law relationship. Clarifying the status from the start avoids painful conflicts and blockages later.

CHAPTER

Decide: sell, buy back or wait

Choose the option that suits both parties.

- Selling and sharing the product: often the clearest solution.
- One buys back the other's share: possible if the buyout is financeable (borrowing capacity, net worth).
- Wait (e.g. until a specific time): sometimes chosen, but to be regulated by written agreement.

Each option has financial, tax and practical implications. A clear decision, put in writing, avoids misunderstandings.

Three options: sell and share (often the most neutral), have one spouse buy out the other's share, or wait (rarely ideal). The right choice depends on your means, the feasibility of the buyout and your need to turn the page. Decide together, in writing if possible.

EMILIE'S ADVICE

Decide on the option and put it in writing, ideally with your advisors. A clear agreement on “who does what and when” greatly reduces the tension in the process.

CHAPTER

Set the price and manage the sale together

Sell effectively despite the context.

Like any sale, we start from a comparative analysis to set a fair price. The difficulty is rather human: two people must agree on the price, the visits, and the offers to accept.

- Rely on neutral facts (ACM) to depersonalize the price.
- Define in advance how decisions (offers) will be made.
- Keep the property presentable despite the context.

Like any sale, we start from a comparative analysis to set a fair price and we prepare the property. The difficulty is coordination between two people in a tense context: entrust logistics and communication to a neutral broker to prevent each decision from becoming a confrontation.

EMILIE'S ADVICE

Entrust the sale to a neutral broker who speaks to both parties as equals. A professional intermediary reduces friction and keeps the transaction on track.

CHAPTER

Share the proceeds of the sale

Clarify sharing and financial aspects.

The sharing of the net proceeds (after repayment of the mortgage and costs) depends on your legal situation and your agreements. The notary can manage the distribution at closing according to the agreed instructions.

Also anticipate your needs for the future: everyone will probably have to find new accommodation. Understanding your ability to purchase or lease aftermarket is part of an informed decision.

The sharing of the net proceeds (after repayment of the mortgage and fees) depends on your status and your agreements. Clarify it in advance and, if necessary, have it legally regulated: unclear sharing is a major source of last-minute conflicts.

EMILIE'S ADVICE

Have it clarified in writing, before closing, how the net proceeds will be shared. The notary will follow these instructions; improvising it on the day of signing is a guaranteed source of conflict.

CHAPTER

Remain functional: support and communication

Sell calmly despite the conflict.

Selling during a separation adds an emotional dimension to an already demanding process. A few benchmarks help you stay on course:

- Agree on the key decisions (price, deadlines) in advance, in writing if possible.
- Go through neutral intermediaries (broker, mediator) to defuse.
- Separate the financial issues personal tensions.
- Be accompanied (notary, legal advisor).

The objective: a transaction that is concluded properly, without the conflict causing both parties to lose money.

Remaining functional despite conflict protects your money: agree on key decisions in advance, work through neutral intermediaries and separate financial issues from personal tensions. A broker as a single channel of communication defuses a lot of tension.

EMILIE'S ADVICE

Entrusting the sale to a neutral broker avoids many direct confrontations. It becomes the single channel of communication on the transaction, which protects the sale - and often your energy.
