COLLECTION SELLERS · GUIDE NO. 20

Selling your condo

Documents, fees and co-ownership-specific pitfalls

Selling a condo is not like selling a house: the buyer also buys a share of a co-ownership, with its finances, its rules and its history. A well-prepared file reassures the buyer and speeds up the sale.

This guide covers the documents to gather, how to present the charges and the contingency fund, and the pitfalls specific to selling in co-ownership.

Each chapter ends with a lined “My Notes” page.

Selling a condo is not selling a house: co-ownership adds documents, collective figures and typical buyers. This guide shows you how to prepare the file, present the finances of the building, market it and avoid the pitfalls specific to condos.

The idea: transform co-ownership life into an argument for trust.

CHAPTER

Prepare the co-ownership file

> Gather in advance what the buyer will require.

- Declaration of co-ownership and regulations for the building.
- Financial statements, budget and amount of expenses up to date.
- Balance of the provident fund, study of the fund, maintenance log.
- Minutes of the last meetings.
- Insurance certificate and statement of special contributions voted.

An informed and reassured buyer negotiates less and withdraws less. Preparing this file in advance is a sales accelerator.

A condo buyer (and his notary, his lender) will require the co-ownership file: declaration, regulations, financial statements, contingency fund, minutes. Bringing it together in advance speeds up the sale and projects an image of sound management.

> EMILIE'S ADVICE
>
> Gather the co-ownership file BEFORE even putting it up for sale. When the buyer requests the documents and everything is ready, you inspire confidence and maintain momentum.

CHAPTER

Present expenses and contingency funds

> Transform a sensitive point into an argument for confidence.

The expenses and health of the contingency fund are scrutinized by informed buyers. A solid fund and realistic charges are selling points; a weak fund will be a bargaining point.

- Highlight a well-capitalized contingency fund and a well-managed building.
- Be transparent about any special contributions voted for or to come.
- Explain what the charges cover (services, maintenance, reserve).

The expenses and health of the provident fund are closely scrutinized: present them clearly rather than endure them. A well-stocked fund and a transparent management history become arguments of confidence - not weak points.

> EMILIE'S ADVICE
>
> A solid retirement fund is a selling point, not just an obligation. Highlight it: it reassures the buyer that there will be no unpleasant surprises in the future.

CHAPTER

Marketing a condo

> Enhance the assets specific to co-ownership.

- Highlight the location, the building's amenities (elevator, gym, terrace) and the “maintenance-free” lifestyle.
- Home staging adapted to small spaces: declutter, maximize light and the impression of space.
- Target the right buyer (first time buyer, professional, downsizing retiree) depending on the condo.

A condo is sold on a lifestyle as much as on square meters: tell the story of this lifestyle.

For a condo, value what is unique to it: location, building amenities, low maintenance, security, parking. Target the lifestyle that your unit allows - it is often this, more than the surface area, that triggers the crush.

>
> Sell the lifestyle: proximity, security, amenities, freedom without maintenance. For many condo buyers, this is the real product.

CHAPTER

Specific pitfalls to avoid

> Anticipate what derails a condo sale.

- Incomplete or untraceable documents: delay and worry the buyer.
- Undisclosed special contribution: source of withdrawal or dispute.
- Declaration restrictions (rental, animals) which put off some buyers: to be clarified early.
- Known building problems (infiltrations, disputes): it is better to approach them frankly.

Transparency on co-ownership is your best ally: it avoids surprises that derail a transaction at the last minute.

The classic traps: incomplete or unobtainable documents (delays and worrying), low contingency fund, undisclosed co-ownership disputes, restrictive rules ignored. Anticipate them: they are the ones who derail a condo sale at the last minute.

> EMILIE'S ADVICE
>
> Never let the buyer discover a special assessment or real estate dispute on his own. What you openly disclose is negotiable; what we discover makes us flee or pursue.

CHAPTER

Who is your condo for?

> Adapt the sale to the typical buyer.

A condo is not sold to “everyone”. Identify your typical buyer helps to present it better:

- First buyer : sensitive to price, charges and proximity to services.
- Downsizer (retired): seeks comfort, tranquility and low maintenance.
- Investor : looks at the yield, the permitted rental and the charges.

Highlight the arguments that speak to your most likely buyer: location, lifestyle, or profitability.

Adapt your marketing to the most likely buyer: first buyer sensitive to price and charges, retiree looking for peace of mind, or investor attentive to yield and permitted rental. The same condo, two different speeches depending on the target.

>
> Adapt your marketing to the most likely buyer of YOUR condo. A 3½ near the metro is sold to a first-time buyer; a large, quiet condo appeals to a retiree. The same good, two speeches.
